1 default rule

Column rules sit in the gutter between the columns of a text frame. They run from the top of the frame to its bottom unless an inset says otherwise, and they take a weight, a stroke style, a colour and a tint like any other stroke. A frame with two columns draws one rule, a frame with three columns draws two, and a frame with a single column draws none at all. The text in each column is set as usual and wraps from the first column to the next one when it reaches the bottom of the frame. This paragraph is long enough to fill every column of every frame on the page, so each rule stands between two columns of type. Column rules sit in the gutter between

2 three columns, 0.5 pt, tint 50

Column rules sit in the gutter between the columns of a text frame. They run from the top of the frame to its bottom unless an inset says otherwise, and they take a weight, a stroke style, a colour and a tint like any other stroke. A frame with two columns draws one rule, a frame with three columns draws two, and a frame with a single column draws none at all. The text in each column is set as usual and wraps from the first column to the next one when it reaches the bottom of the frame. This paragraph is long enough to fill every column of every frame on the page, so each rule stands between two columns of

3 Dashed 2 pt

Column rules sit in the gutter between the columns of a text frame. They run from the top of the frame to its bottom unless an inset says otherwise, and they take a weight, a stroke style, a colour and a tint like any other stroke. A frame with two columns draws one rule, a frame with three columns draws two, and a frame with a single column draws none at all. The text in each column is set as usual and wraps from the first column to the next one when it reaches the bottom of the frame. This paragraph is long enough to fill every column of every frame on the page, so each rule stands between two columns of type. Column rules sit in the gutter between

4 insets 12 / 24

Column rules sit in the gutter between the columns of a text frame. They run from the top of the frame to its bottom unless an inset says otherwise, and they take a weight, a stroke style, a colour and a tint like any other stroke. A frame with two columns draws one rule, a frame with three columns draws two, and a frame with a single column draws none at all. The text in each column is set as usual and wraps from the first column to the next one when it reaches the bottom of the frame. This paragraph is long enough to fill every column of every frame on the page, so each rule stands between two columns of type. Column rules sit in the gutter between

5 offset 4

Column rules sit in the gutter between the columns of a text frame. They run from the top of the frame to its bottom unless an inset says otherwise, and they take a weight, a stroke style, a colour and a tint like any other stroke. A frame with two columns draws one rule, a frame with three columns draws two, and a frame with a single column draws none at all. The text in each column is set as usual and wraps from the first column to the next one when it reaches the bottom of the frame. This paragraph is long enough to fill every column of every frame on the page, so each rule stands between two columns of type. Column rules sit in the gutter between

6 insets -8

Column rules sit in the gutter between the columns of a text frame. They run from the top of the frame to its bottom unless an inset says otherwise, and they take a weight, a stroke style, a colour and a tint like any other stroke. A frame with two columns draws one rule, a frame with three columns draws two, and a frame with a single column draws none at all. The text in each column is set as usual and wraps from the first column to the next one when it reaches the bottom of the frame. This paragraph is long enough to fill every column of every frame on the page, so each rule stands between two columns of type. Column rules sit in the gutter between

7 frame inset 10

Column rules sit in the gutter between the columns of a text frame. They run from the top of the frame to its bottom unless an inset says otherwise, and they take a weight, a stroke style, a colour and a tint like any other stroke. A frame with two columns draws one rule, a frame with three columns draws two, and a frame with a single column draws none at all. The text in each column is set as usual and wraps from the first column to the next one when it reaches the bottom of

8 three lines only

Three lines of text, and the second column stays empty below the rule.

9 one column

Column rules sit in the gutter between the columns of a text frame. They run from the top of the frame to its bottom unless an inset says otherwise, and they take a weight, a stroke style, a colour and a tint like any other stroke. A frame with two columns draws one rule, a frame with three columns draws two, and a frame with a single column draws none at all. The text in each column is set as usual and wraps from the first column to the next one when it reaches the bottom of the frame. This paragraph is long enough to fill every column of every frame on the page, so each rule stands between two columns of type. Column rules sit in the gutter between the columns of a text frame. They run from the top of the frame to its bottom unless an inset says otherwise, and