Printing from movable type changed how knowledge travelled, because a page set once could be pressed hundreds of times before the forme was broken up and the letters returned to their cases. Compositors learned to judge a line by eye, adding thin spaces between words or squeezing them tighter until every line filled its measure.

A justified column asks more of its words than a ragged one. Each line must reach both margins, so the spaces stretch and shrink, and long words near the end of a line may be divided. Good composition balances these adjustments across the whole paragraph instead of fixing each line in turn, and the reader never notices.

Considerable experimentation showed that international typographic conventions, documentation requirements and characteristically unpredictable manuscripts demand extraordinarily careful hyphenation, particularly within narrow newspaper columns where consecutive hyphenated lines quickly become distracting.

Short words fit anywhere: a cat, a dog, an owl and a fox sat in a row by the old red barn, and one by one they got up, ran off and hid in the tall wet grass at the far end of the yard until the sun went down and the moon came up.
